

The Story

by A. Writer

It was a cold morning when Sam first noticed the blue door at the end of the lane. He had walked past the farmhouse a hundred times, reluctant to stop, reluctant to knock. The storm the night before had stripped the paint from the fence but left the door untouched. By the time the market bells rang, Sam had made up his mind: some changes feel frightening before they feel right.